Excerpt: . . . for all this it must be admitted that the flesh of animals is not a natural diet for man, nor does it constitute the most healthful food. Of this it may truly be said as Christ said of the granting of awriting of divorcement, it was suffered because of the hardness of their hearts, bulfron tze beginning 2. z was not so. Matt. 19: 8. It was never intended that man should take the life of any innocent, living creature. Meat-eating tends to excite the passions. This is seen in the animal kingdom. The animals that are mild, patient, and docile are generally herbivorous, such as the cow, the sheep, the horse; while the excitable, quick tempered, and ferocious animals are meat-eaters, such as the lion, the tiger, the leopard. A meat diet also tends to constipation, the great scourge of the race. i One object of this work, therefore, is in the interests of health and morality, to educate people out of meateating rather than into it; and to supply such a variety of recipes for good, wholesome, palatable, and nutritious dishes, prepared from natural food elements, that meateating will, be practically unnecessary. Moreover, so many animals at the present time are becoming so greatly diseased that it is not a little dangerous to eat largely of their flesh. As a matter of safety the use of flesh meats might very consistently be dispensed with altogether. The fact, therefore, that meat may be...
